The Golden Eagle (Aquila chrysaëtus). This splendid bird, the largest of our eagles, is found in North Britain, and also in a few isolated localities in Ireland. It flies with a few powerful strokes, and then glides along with no apparent movement of the wings. Its food is the mountain hare and grouse, while it now and again seizes a lamb from the fold. The nest, which is added to every year, is an unwieldly construction made of sticks with some softer lining, placed in a high tree or inaccessible rock. The eggs are generally two in number, of a greyish colour with reddish-brown spots.
